What Every AFRICAN AMERICAN Should Know

Secret's Revealed by Kerry Davis

African Americans Ain't Africans

Master musician Stevie Wonder once said “when you believe in things that you don’t understand, then you suffer”. As many people in America suffer, none suffer the humiliation, the degradation and the outright disrespect as the so called African American. One can pontificate all day the police brutality, the injustices in the court systems, the horrible education system, the unhealthy garbage that poses as food to make the people fat and stupid.

After you go through the list of everything that ails the African American, once must ask a simple yet very serious question?

What is the African Americans role in all of this? Why doesn’t the African American say to themselves enough is enough and change their miserable condition?

The answer is so simple that it statures most of us in the face, but our attention is focused solely on consuming that we don’t even see it.

The African American suffers greatly because they are confused of who they are and what their purpose on the planet is.

The narrative that African Americans are given about themselves were given to them by foreigners, people who flee their countries in search for a better life.

African Americans stories about themselves doesn’t come from their forefathers and mothers. The stories that you hear about African Americans come from people whose sole purpose is to dominate and exploit the Indigenous people of the Americas in general and of North America in particular.

Since they are “trained” in an educational system that trains them to memorize without thinking and obey without questioning, the African American finds himself in a conundrum.

African Americans are given the story that they’re ancestors were ripped from Africa and taken across the Atlantic to the new world. Really?

If this story is true, then a few questions can be asked as to the validity of the story. And when these questions are asked, all hell breaks loose. Why? Because African Americans don’t really think, they wait for someone to tell them what is and is not truth. But once they start to think, a whole new world emerges.

Transatlantic Slave Myth

In order to confuse the African American and remove them from their ancestral homeland was to convince them that they came from a foreign land in the trunk of a ship....

As I stated earlier, the education system in America trains the African American not to think. If the system that shapes and maintains behavior did train the African American to think, every person who sees this image would ask some serious, critical questions.

Questions like:

If they are sailing across the Atlantic bouncing up and down on the high seas, how could these people survive if they are being thrown around like rag dolls for 5000 miles?

Who fed them and what did they eat? What about human waste? You mean these people just urinated, defecated and vomited all over the place, plus ate in those same conditions?

Why aren't there any stories coming out of Africa saying their people were kidnapped and taken over seas?

Where are the slave ships? I mean I would be satisfied with one.

Where were these ships built? What forest were chopped down to build them?

Ask yourself these questions, you'll be surprised of the answers.

Why the African American is in the position they are in, is because they are the so called Indians and simply don't know it. Simple terms like West Indians lets you know about the people in the Caribbean. And even many of them claim they are Africans. African Americans just don't get it.
